

European Mobility Week

Posted on September 16, 2012 by Marvi Eiland

This week (16.-22. September) is the Mobility Week in Europe where over 1800 cities focus on getting around in town sustainably.

While Austria and Spain are the true believers of the campaign, with around 600 participating cities each, Germany has 13 cities that are signed up for action [unfortunately not Freiburg], and Estonia has just 1 [yes, it's Tallinn].

What's happening during the week?

The cities have planned out activities around the focal theme, also a common event "In town without my car" which means that cities reserve areas that are only for pedestrians, cyclists or public transport. In Brussels, today (16 September) was the Car Free Sunday, and starting from Monday, in Tallinn everybody who owns a drivers licence can take the public transport for free! Great idea Tallinn, but why not give a pat on the back to those who already take the public transport and make it free for everyone?

Definitely check out more on the European Mobility Week Facebook page or website.

If you want to share with us awesome photos you've taken or seen on the net, keep up posted!!

◀ Naturalness in the eco-city of Freiburg
What is green for me might not be so green for you ▶

